A mathematical challenge to materials

Motoko Kotani

Tohoku University

Materials research and development faces a big change. Advanced technology to observe and control atoms and molecules has been developed and requires deep understanding of relations between microscopic structures and macroscopic properties. In the talk, I would like to introduce discrete geometric approach to materials; Discrete surface theory for carbon materials, index theorem for topologically protected surface states, topological analysis to detect global structure from local data.